Abstract

Forgiveness is about many things, but at the core, forgiveness is about recovering from violation and trauma in a way that does not harm the victim or victimizer. Forgiveness is often thought of as a "letting go" of pain, anger and bitterness. In this workshop, participants learn that forgiveness is not so much about "letting go" as it is about "putting back." "Putting back" is about restoring as much love and trustworthiness to the relationships as is feasible and desirable in an ethical and sound therapeutic manner. Using the Restoration Model of therapy, participants will understand how love and trustworthiness form essential frameworks in the human psyche associated with identity and safety. When love and trustworthiness are violated, pain and coping results which tends to turn the victimized into potential victimizer. The Restoration Model sets the groundwork for not only understanding how identity and safety are damaged, but also how the client and therapist can work toward self-regulation and move toward constructive relationships. The work of forgiveness specifically outlines four pathways or stations to forgiveness. Insight is the first station that focuses work with the victim to be able to stop the victimizer from continuing violations. The second station is called Understanding and is where the victim comes to understand the development, history and limitations of the victimizer and the past legacy of the victimizer's own victimization. Giving the Opportunity for Compensation is the third station and focuses on the victim and victimizer rebuilding a trustworthy relationship through sequential interactions that build a sense of safety. Finally, Overt Forgiveness is the station that allows victim and victimizer to confront the issue of past violations and restore their relationship through conversation and dialogue.

Through each topic of the model as well as each station in the work of forgiveness, ethical considerations for the individual, family and other relationships will be discussed and examined. Richly illustrated through case examples, experiential activities and group discussion, this workshop promises to move therapists to a new understanding of helping those who have been hurt by relationships.
